Roll-over 10x is a term used in the world of derivatives and finance, especially in the stock market. It refers to a trading strategy for investment that involves buying or selling the same financial asset repeatedly in a short period of time - generally within the same day - with the goal of profiting from small price movements. The strategy consists of buying and selling the same asset during the same day without closing the position, giving rise to the expression "Roll over 10x".

This strategy requires a careful and attentive analysis of the various price movements and market trends, in a way that the buying and selling must be executed rapidly to obtain profits. All of this is also very important and highlights the need for a high frequency of transactions with this strategy, generally associated with high transaction costs. This can negatively impact the financial return.

Therefore, the Roll-over 10x is a trading strategy of investment with high risk that should only be used by experienced and well-informed operators.
